ATCO Gas donation supports Irricana's heritage building preservation

Irricana, AB. — Local efforts to restore Irricana's 80-year-old heritage building in time for the town's 2011 centennial celebrations received a $2,000 boost from ATCO Gas today.

"Irricana's newly named Centennial Building is an important historical site in Alberta. After restoration efforts are complete, the building will continue to foster a sense of community pride and appreciation for local history among residents and visitors alike," explains ATCO Gas president Brian Hahn.

Hahn added: "ATCO Gas and its employees have been a part of Irricana for over 50 years and we are pleased to support a project that will not only enrich the quality of life in the town but also enhance community spirit and strength."

Irricana's heritage building was first constructed in 1929 and since that time has been a general store, dance hall, theatre, co-operative, fire hall, municipal office, health unit and community hall. It was recently renamed the Irricana Centennial Centre which will be officially recognized during the town's centennial celebrations in June 2011.

"I wish to thank ATCO Gas for their contribution today," says Mayor Josh Taylor. "The long working relationship between Irricana and ATCO Gas is just one example of the great relationships and stories that we are trying to preserve with this project."
